

For readers of Kristin Hannah and Maggie O Farrell – a quiet, unflinching love story about what it costs to be known, and what it gives back.

Some people manage what they show the world so carefully that the managing becomes the person. Maya Vasquez has been doing it for years — a PhD candidate and gallery curator who knows all the exits, who built her composure deliberately and has never lowered it for anyone.

Ethan Calloway photographs the truth in people. He believes the right light reveals what was always there but hidden. When they meet in a museum after closing time, he begins to see something in her that she has never let anyone see.

Maya has a secret she has never shown anyone — something she carries in her body that has shaped every decision she has made about intimacy. She has not disclosed it since the one time she did, and what followed was a cruelty she never recovered from. She is not certain she will survive showing anyone again.

Ethan does not flinch.
